HE POLYNESIAN. SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1853.

Winds, Harbor and Shipping.

The wind continues to blow from the Westward, and vessels are thus prevented from going to sea from the harbor of Honolulu. A large number are ready for sea, some of which have been waiting for two weeks a change of wind. From some indications, apparent to the weather-wise a change is looked for soon, when the embargo will be raised, and a scattering will take place among the fleet, to all parts of the world. During the prevalence of the late Westerly winds, some little damage has been sustained by vessels in the harbor from getting foul, chafing, &c., but nothing to any serious amount. When properly moored, vessels are as secure in Honolulu harbor, as in almost any other in the world; its small capacity alone is the only circumstance to its disadvantage. It would accommodate some 180 vessels, and its capability might be increased to 200, by the use of a dredging machine, which wi'l soon be an absolute necessity for the convenience of the increasing number of vessels that resort here for recruits and commercial purposes.

Hedges.

The following schedule of plants and seed for hedges is the one referred to by Mr. Castle in his communication last week. The attempt to introduce them into California by Mr. Watson failed on account of the loss of the box containing them in crossing the Isthmus of Panama.
